

It is true that our concept of 'family' is stronger than in other cultures, and we have strong support from our families. However, it is not accurate to call us 'Mummy's boys': we stay at our parent's home just until we have the money to pay our own flat or house. A 'Mummy's boy', for Italians, is actually a grown up man that cannot do anything without the help of his parents.

Italians are "Mummy's boys

Even if it's actually true that most of Italians think they dress up better than people from other nationalities, it is not true to say that we are obsessed by fashion: if we do look good we are not working

We don't eat spaghetti with meatballs, maybe with other

Italians always eat spaghetti

True/False

Our families are very large, especially families from the south of Italy. Until the previous generation it was common to have more than 6 children. Nowadays, things have changed, and every family unit usually has just one or two children.

We are actually really loud when we speak, but not because we are angry or deaf, it's just our voice tone.

Italians are always so loud!

Italian

stereotypes

This stereotype comes from the fact that, especially in the south, is custom to give children their Grandparents' or a Saint's name. That's why we have so many Maria's or Giuseppe's. But we do actually have lots of different names.

Of course, we love eating our pasts and pizzs, but it isn't true that we only eat them. We constantly try to change our menus during the week, and we usually follow the Mediterranean diet.

Italians are only "Pizza, Pasta, Waccheroni"

The majority of Italians are obsessed with football. Absolutely! Even if you are not watching the match on TV, you can hear your neighborhood cheering when their team scores a goal.

Italians do actually use their hands when they talk; a gesture is a part of concept, and even if we try not to move our hands while talking, we cannot resist.

Italians talk with their hands

Mamma Mia!" is not such a

Italians are not always tanned, especially if they are from the north of Italy. Usually, people from the south have tanned skin and darker hair but not all the people from the north are blond, and not all those from the talians always have tanned

We do actually love coffee, or at least the majority of Italian people love coffee. But it's not true that all Italians love it.

Italy the extraordinary commonplace:

https://www.youtuse.com/watchyo-Laxquision4

