

Social values

To eat together can for many people be a part that keeps the family together. But for my family it's hard to eat dinner with each other because my brother and I have football practice at different times and sometimes my mom works late... We try to make it work around two times a week, but that doesn't really affect us. We still have quality time to talk with each other on the evenings. Sweden is a multicultural country which can make people get hurt if you act in a way that's not normal in a country. That's why you should respect others to get the respect back.

The word "moderate" describes Sweden well. You shouldn't be too much but also not too little. Maybe that's about to change because of the multicultural and because of how the world affect us and make people want to stand out.

In a public place the sweeds have a lot of norms or unwritten rules, example of those are that you stand on the right side of the escalator, we are also very strict when it comes to standing in ques. If you don't do this, the sweeds are very good to judge you or give a mad stare. There are people that can confront the "rulebreakers" too, but as I said it's more likely to give a mad stare, a sigh or a mumble. In Sweden people don't have much civil courage. If people are fighting in public most people will just walk by or stand there and watch. People do not want to get in other people's business. But if someone steps in and tries to stop it people are going to tag along, they just don't want to be the first one to do it.
