Autumn in my country

Autumn has come. Almost all birds fly away to warmer regions leaving behind those that are used to our colder weather. Green, red, yellow and orange leaves paint a beautiful landscape that makes people believe in magic and the sunlight appear warmer than ever. Autumn is the time when Moldovan farmers count their harvest and analyze how much they have produced giving others an incentive to sum up their results over the year and think how to improve them.

Not only the countryside looks different now, but also the large cities change their aspects. It is windy, colder and the light rain becomes a soundtrack for urban environments. Pupils, students, mothers and children, they all change their outfits and take out jackets and sweaters to avoid the side effects of this season, such as flu and coughing.
