The way you're planning to get involved in the Erasmus+ programme:

Some keywords to describe your school:	A large school with students of many diverse backgrounds. There are students facing serious problems, such as financial deprivation, drug addiction in the family, or severe learning difficulties. There are cases of pupils dropping school off in the middle of the school year, due mainly to financial and family problems. Moreover, there are certain cases of pupils showing offensive or delinquent conduct. Finally, in my school there does not exist a feeling of belonging to a larger European environment, where Greece is a core member. I think the pupils of my school need to participate in European projects like Erasmus+, in order to evaluate values like democracy, tolerance and respect to other citizens. If I am to expose a specific incident in my school, then I would refer to the proposal made to my school by the Education Authorities to host refugee pupils from Syria in afternoon classes. The school refused to accept those pupils in the end, because the school community (including teachers) raised issues against.

Ideas for a school-to-school partnership:

My school can set up partnerships with schools from other European countries which can serve as models to others regarding integration of the school in the community, successful tackling of incidents and the culture of violence, and international orientation. We could work in partnership with schools that exhibit diversity and multi-national backgrounds, and in general with schools that could help us understand our position in Europe and the world.

The way you're planning to get involved in the Erasmus+ programme:

Some keywords to describe your school:	The Primary School of Skopelos Lesvou is a 6-class Primary School of about 100 students in a rural area in the middle of the island of Lesvos. The school is involved in several environmental and cultural projects. A big number of students come from disadvantaged backgrounds as their parents are mainly involved in agriculture and lack opportunities to travel, to contact tourists and experience other cultures and different mentalities. That makes them rather cautious towards foreigners and in the light of the recent Immigration Crisis they have found themselves in the core of it, experiencing a change of their social environment as the number of refugees in Lesvos has been overwhelming.
---	--

Ideas for a school-to-school partnership:

The schools could work together on an Erasmus+ project on how to integrate and include the newly-arriving immigrants, how to cope with feelings of distrust and xenophobia and how to involve their parents and the community, in general, in inclusion activities. The students from Lesvos having to experience the refugee crisis in their daily lives could prove to play an integral part, being the starting point of how to live according to the European values, and how to deal with problems arising from immigration with the utmost respect towards human life.

Some keywords to describe your school:	Secondary school. Deprived city area. Children and young people with poor school performances and learning difficulties. Early school-leavers. High percentage of child immigrants, refugees and children from immigrant or refugee families. Children belonging to different ethnic minorities. Children with linguistic and/or cultural adaption difficulties. Children of families with a low standard of living, low income, dependence on the social welfare system. Poverty. Cultural differences. Segregation. Risk of criminal and anti- social activities, anti-social behavior, street gangs and radicalization.
Ideas for a school-to-school partnership:	We need to develop preventive strategies that focus on the behaviour and identity. To understand the mechanisms behind these behavioural processes. We are for example interested in exploring creative ways to include violence and radicalization as discussion topics in school. By doing that the aim is to "mainstream" these topics and make it easier for our pupils to talk about it and express their thoughts and experiences.
