

Homeschooling

Since the outbreak of the Covid-19 virus, a lot of things have changed. Many shops had to be closed, our social interactions have been reduced and also schools were forced to close and teach the students from home. But how does homeschooling affect the students and do they even learn anything like this?

It is a good thing that we all stay at home and prevent the virus from spreading, because Covid-19 is highly contagious and if we went to school during this complicated time, it wouldn't end well. To let these many students be taught in a confined space, to only let them out on the schoolyard to get in contact with even more students, risks their health and safety from the virus. It would only be alright to go to school with special measures.

Because of homeschooling, there is no fixed schedule and the students have more time and less stress. They can decide on their own how they divide their tasks. Because of that, the students become more independent and more responsible for actually learning what they're supposed to learn.

But there are many students who thought that they can be lazy during this pandemic and have done nothing. If the teachers don't make the students send their solutions to them, many wouldn't do the exercises that were given to them. There is also the problem with those who are a little slow and have problems with learning on their own. Even though they got the notes to solve the given tasks and they could have written an email if they didn't understand something, they have done most of the teaching on their own.

Homeschooling also brings the problem with it that if they only let the students stay at home, they won't have any contact with friends and the outside world like they would have in school. That can weigh heavily on the mental state. As human beings we need at least a little social interactions with others in this case without touching and being too close of course.

In conclusion it is important to keep our distance, but homeschooling for a long period of time wouldn't be recommended, because it would require that every student has to be reliable and none of them must have any problem with the learning material, which is unlikely. As long as the measures are taken it would be better to let the students attend school than homeschooling. My experience with homeschooling was actually quite pleasing for me because it was less stressful, but I prefer going to school.
