

A day without electricity

We live in an age where we rely on technology to make life easier and feel as comfortable as possible. For example, we rely on 24 hours of electricity. Therefore, the discovery of electricity is one of the greatest achievements of civilization.

Well, let's think a little. Without the computer, we could no longer search for information about what we wanted and could no longer talk to friends. Without the TV, I no longer saw the news and interesting documentaries. Without phones I lose touch with the farthest. Without light I would use the candle again as in the Middle Ages. In conclusion, we notice that the world has changed radically and each of us is dependent on electricity. Using electricity has made life easier from lighting a room to sending a rocket into space.

I tried to resist a day without electricity finding other activities that I could do, for example: reading a book, biking, drawing or even practicing a sport.

I mean, I'm not an adept of the Internet, but the fact that I have nothing else to do to relax, I always find the solution „the phone" , but today it was not so. It took about half a day to do some of the things said above. It was great until I had nothing to do, because as I said people are dependent on electricity, especially the internet, so I did not have anyone to spend the rest of my day. My opinion is that if there was no electricity in some cases, the world would be different, but most of them spend their lives „together" with electricity.

Ciucurel Raluca.