

When our teachers told us about the Erasmus Project I was a little astonished. I remember it was early in the morning so I was really tired and I did not understand at first. Even though I was sure that I wanted to go.

The trip was really valuable. I was not expecting to have a trip to Greece, even less to Crete, in my life. I met awesome people there, knowing an entirely new culture. The food was really different from Spain, more cheap and abundant. Besides, I was able to get to know my classmates better. Due to the covid we could not be in the same class the last year, so we were like strangers to each other.

Moreover we have not been able to meet with the bulgarians in person, and I feel like we were missing a part.

From my personal point of view I think that it was really useful. Until now, I have not noticed that there are projects for the environment in studies like mine. Crete was a really beautiful place, although it is true that you can see the pollution. Some of the ancient buildings, like the Minotaur's Maze, were a little darker.

I found that in the three schools there are plenty of recycle bins. As far as I am concerned, the big problem is not in the resources rather than the people. We need to be all conscious about it, and these programs help a lot.
