

Sustainable development - gender equality

We started with a lesson about sustainable development and the three dimensions. Our focus was on gender equality, and we learned about why it is so important, and how it is in the different parts of the world.

«Everyone should have the right to». We made a tree with hands that symbolize what we think everyone should have. Some of the things are: freedom, school, safety, job and money.

After researching and learning more about gender equality, both in Norway and in different places in the world, we made a videopresentation using the app Explain Everything. This tool allowed us to be creative with multimodal texts. Working in pairs the pupils followed a number of criteria, such as explaining the UNs sustainable development goals, defining gender equality, argue why we need a goal concerning this issue and how it can affect us in Norway. With the international woman's day around the corner many chose to also talk about women in leadership - like the first female vice president in the US Kamala Harris, Norways prime minister Erna Solberg and Ramberg's own principal Anne Merete.
