

Someone stole my online identity and started to impersonate me.

Everything started 3 years ago when I was in high school, I was playing with my friends when I saw that one of them wasn't talking to me and was looking mad at me. I asked him why he wasn't talking, and he said that I knew why. I started thinking on a reason for him to be mad at me, but I wasn't finding none.

During the week, after that, more people also started to be mad at me, not just friends but also people that I hadn't talked with for some time, and I still wasn't understanding the reason. I only figured it out two weeks later when I was scrolling on my Instagram page and saw that I had been having conversations with all the persons that were following me, but I never really started a conversation with none of them. That's when I understood that I had been hacked in my Instagram account. The person who hacked me started to impersonate me sending fake messages saying bad things to other people and posting randoms things on my account. I couldn't let him continue like that, so I decided to try to do the same things he did to me.

First, I had to fix what he did, so I changed my account password so that he couldn't enter in my account no more. Then, I sent messages to all my contacts to explain that it wasn't me that I had been hacked. After that, I called my brother who works in hardware and online security and asked him if he could help me hack the guy who hacked me. Thirty minutes later, he found the guy and hacked him, the guy's name was Frank Eustache and he was from Belgium.

After my brother hacked his account, he asked me what I wanted to do in his account, I thought for a minute, and I said that I wanted to erase it. My brother asked me if I was sure that I wanted to do this and I said yes, so he started to write some lines and the account disappeared. After that, everyone stopped being mad at me and since then, I started to be more careful when I'm online to try not to be hacked once again.
